

EDITORIAL NOTE

Dear Readers,

We present to you the third issue of international Journal of nursing in our continuous effort to keep you informed and ensure the viability of the journal. The present issue has research articles on diverse subjects. Nursing as an organized body of professionals and a disciplinary body of knowledge has attempted to address major change through major innovation. It would be innovative for nursing as a profession and for nurses to act on their own goals and values those that promote health and quality of life in humanistic and socially critical ways. Radical change in nursing is incremental or a rehashing of traditional perspectives and methods. The change is dramatic, abrupt and creative. Only radical change brought about by big innovative ideas and action can deliver a health care system and nursing care delivery that really works for both patients and nurses. The quality of ideas and the breadth of innovation is a notion that is given enough attention in nursing. I admire the authors whose innovations are included in this issue of International Journal of Nursing and nurses everywhere who struggle to make things better. We encourage authors to publish their articles with International Journal of Nursing as all the advantages of online publication. I thank you for supporting and patronizing International Journal of Nursing.

The Editor-In-Chief

International Journal of Nursing
www.ijnonline.com